The Art of Protest

A duo exhibition by FAKE and L.E.T. at Pretty Portal, Düsseldorf

Stencil art has always been rooted in protest. The technique didn't emerge from studios, but from the streets — as a weapon of words and images in times when speaking out was dangerous. In the 1960s and '70s, activists and artists used stencils to spread political messages quickly and effectively: against war, for freedom, for equality. The walls became the people's newspapers, and the spray can their printing press of resistance.

In the 1980s, stencil art gained new meaning through artists like Blek le Rat in Paris and later Banksy in London. Their work showed that protest doesn't always have to shout — it can also whisper, using humor, irony, and aesthetics as its tools.

The Art of Protest continues this tradition through the works of FAKE and L.E.T. Both artists use stencils to question power, challenge conformity, and provoke thought. Their imagery is bold, layered, and inevitably political — a reminder that true art still dares to disturb.

The stencil remains what it has always been: the voice of those who demand to be heard.

FAKE and L.E.T. are both pioneers of stencil art. For more than thirty years, stencil and spray paint have been their artistically weapons of choice. Through their works, they have continuously responded to current events, leaving their artistic commentary in public spaces.
